high-priority use cases as early as possible, (3) it is incremental, this reduces the risk of requirements misconception. Its disadvantages are: (1) an iterative process is more difficult to manage and schedule, (2) the early versions of the UP emphasize too much on documentation and much of it is not used, (3) the UP is a process, not a methodology, therefore, it is useful only for experienced software developers.

- 2.2 Write an essay about how a good process and a good methodology help tackling the project and product challenges. Limit the length of the essay to five pages, or according to the instructions of the instructor.

Solution. There could be many different answers to this exercise. It is difficult to come up with a standard solution and use it to grade the submissions. However, the answer should show how a good process and methodology address each of the challenges. Figure 2.1 of this manual highlights the main points and provides pointers to related chapters.

Grading of this exercise could be done by reading the solutions submitted by the students, according to the writing, the grader classifies the solutions into 3-5 categories such as very good, good, fair, below, and poor. Each of the categories is then reviewed and a score is assigned to each of the solution.

- 2.3 Write a brief essay on the differences between a software process and a software methodology.

Solution. Figure 2.11 of the textbook shows the differences between a process and a methodology. Therefore, the student needs only to explain the differences in the essay. Section 2.6.1 of the textbook presents the differences. A student's solution may reuse the materials in the section, and/or augment with practical examples, or experience.
